Umbridge first attempted to interrogate Harry with the use of Veritaserum but Professor Snape informed her that he had none left. Initially, Ron thought that a student at the meeting had betrayed them, until Hermione pointed out that if they had, she would have known about it due to the jinx she placed on the parchment that they all signed. In the prison, a deal is made where the protestors would plead "Nolo Contendere" and receive a five-day suspended sentence.

The chapter, located roughly at the end of the first half of the novel, is a clinch. Now that's a very important and profound question. The author was stridently a moralist, disturbed by the lack of expected sequences.

They watched the liberation of Cherbourg, drove through the rubble of St. Allri members welcome Harry back on 1 May, All this was terrible, terrible, as that moral journal Time has told us.
